Currently, there is no convenient and reliable methodology to evaluate the viability of sperm in a flow cytometry-based in vitro fertilization (IVF) laboratory. In particular, there is no complete, simple and inexpensive set of instruments or protocols for the separate evaluation of live/dead cells, nuclei and metabolic cellular content. Here we present a unique live-dead staining methodology based on the analysis of red and green fluorescence from the SYBR-21/propidium iodide (PI) dye. We present the development of an automated, quantitative flow cytometry method to evaluate the relative viability of sperm. The ability of this new methodology to discriminate live from dead sperm is tested using red/green fluorescent propidium iodide/SYBR-21 as a viability stain. Our new methodology can be used to rapidly evaluate sperm viability without the use of any additional or special equipment. Additionally, we demonstrate the ability of this new methodology to separate live/dead cells based on their scattering properties. This new methodology can be easily adapted to most flow cytometry instruments, as
